‘Who will those (future) leaders be?’

They will be people who now, today, are forging ahead - not spectacularly or with fanfare but modestly and quietly. They are the plain, simple people who are doing their best on their present jobs with us, whatever those jobs may happen to be. Such people will not fail us when called for bigger things.

It is for them, our successors, to remember that all the glamour, romance, and success of our business, at any stage of its existence, must be the product of years resulting from the work of many devoted people, and there can be no glamour, no romance, no truly great success, unless shed in by all.”
